What Is Ekō (Dedication of Merit)?

March is the season of Ohigan. Centered on the Spring Equinox, this is a special time when we listen to the Buddha's teaching, remember those who have passed away, and reflect upon our own lives. During Ohigan services, we chant the sutras together. At the conclusion of the chanting, a passage called the Eko-mon, or Dedication of Merit, is recited.

While wording differs slightly among Buddhist traditions, one well-known form expresses the wish:

May the merit acquired here be shared with all beings, so that we and all beings together may attain Buddhahood.

This expresses the aspiration that the virtue cultivated through the service does not remain with oneself alone but extends to all beings everywhere.

The word ekō comes from the Sanskrit term pariṇāma, which means "transformation," "turning," or "redirection." In Buddhism, it refers to directing the merit arising from wholesome actions beyond oneself, toward others.

At first glance, this may seem to contradict the Buddhist principle of karma—that each person receives the results of their own actions. How, then, can merit be shared?

To understand this, we may consider the example of a tree. Each leaf produces nutrients through photosynthesis when it receives sunlight. Yet those nutrients do not remain in the leaf alone. They circulate throughout the entire tree, nourishing the trunk, branches, and roots. Even leaves that do not receive enough sunlight are sustained by the whole.

This is the meaning of the dedication of merit.

In the same way, our lives are deeply interconnected. None of us lives alone. We exist supported by one another.

During the season of Ohigan, as we listen to the words of dedication of merit, we are reminded that our lives are part of this greater whole. Eko gently teaches us that we live within a profound network of connections, supported by countless others.

The Great Tree (for the students)

Long ago, there stood a very great tree.

For many, many years, it remained in the same place. Its thick trunk rose straight toward the sky, and its wide branches stretched out in every direction.

When spring came, many leaves appeared on its branches. Some leaves were small, and some were large.

Some grew high up near the sky, and others grew lower down near the trunk.

On sunny days, the light of the sun shone upon the tree.

The leaves high above received much of the sunlight and sparkled brightly in the air.

The leaves lower down did not receive as much light. They were shaded by branches and other leaves above them.

Still, when the wind blew, all the leaves moved together. The high leaves and the low leaves swayed in the same wind.

When the rain fell, all the leaves received the same rain. The tree stood quietly, and every leaf remained held by its branches.

One day, a leaf growing low on the tree began to notice something.

It was not there by itself. It was connected to a branch. It was connected to the trunk. It was part of the great tree.

When the wind moved the leaves above, that movement traveled through the branches and the trunk, and the lower leaves moved as well.

The tree was one.

Though there were many leaves, they were not separate. They were all living as part of the same tree.

As evening came, the great tree stood quietly beneath the sky.

And in this way, for hundreds of years, the great tree continued to stand quietly beneath the open sky.
